

Re: Michael Clark, would you like to make a retraction?

Re: Michael Clark, would you like to make a retraction?

Source: <http://sci.tech-archive.net/Archive/sci.anthropology.paleo/2008-02/msg00357.html>

- From: "Makouli" <men@xxxxxxxx>
 - Date: Mon, 11 Feb 2008 19:19:10 -0600
-

<claudiusdenk@xxxxxxxxxxxxxxxx> wrote in message
news:4ab9aa1a-b6d1-4201-b7be-0bc0135d9190@xx
[...]

Could you take some time out of your busy schedule to show me just what you'd like me to retract? Or are we gonna play this little dodge game of yours until the cows
come home?

If you now say that you dispute Lee's assertion that HE regularly outran predators and ran-down kudu and antelope why did you not dispute it before? And then there's the rather obvious observation that humans cannot go far without access to fresh water. It never even occurred to you that this was inconsistent with reality as we know it. As long as it comes from the mouth of an anthropologists you treat it as gospel--literally.

First of all, as Lee says elsewhere, such a thing was never said. So how can I dispute or support something that exists in your mind only? And what of the point that humans need fresh water? And how is it supposed to occur to me "that this was inconsistent with reality as we know it? How am I supposed to parse such a combobulation of sentences? Sure, without fresh water, and depending on the environment, humans are good for about 2 days. I wouldn't call that an upward bound nor can I resist pointing out that alot of wusses start complaining much earlier than that but ~so what ~? Is there a point to this wild goose chase?

So when you finally do get around to substance , we discover that all that McGinnian posturing was just that.
Would you like me to say that I'm surprised?

Re: Michael Clark, would you like to make a retraction?

Re: Michael Clark, would you like to make a retraction?

I think it is becoming more and more obvious that the lack of thought that comes from you is truly indicative of a lack of understanding.

You're way out of your league here, Dimmy. Maybe you should get into creative writing or some sort of poetry/performance art....?

=====

"Why don't you look it up[?]"
Dimmy --12/29/07

.