

Re: Michael Clark, would you like to make a retraction?

your notion that HE regularly escaped (or is it "outdistanced" — whatever that means) lion-like predators. For starters let me ask this one question, do envision HE running and simultaneously straining to look back, poking at the lion? What other details can you enlighten us with?

And what of the point that humans need fresh water? And how is it supposed to occur to me "that this was inconsistent with reality as we know it?"

You really have no understanding of evolutionary biology at all. Do you?

Be honest. It's not like it isn't apparent to anybody reading this.

How am I supposed to parse such a combobulation of sentences?

Don't ask me. It's your fantasy. You are the one that puts HE in treeless habitat competing with sabertoothed lion, outrunning and hyena hunting and scavenging large mammals.

Sure, without fresh water, and depending on the environment, humans are good for about 2 days.

Right. So they'd be extremely vulnerable to drought and its complications than, let's say, a zebra. Right? Or even a baboon. Right? Kinda make you wonder what they were doing out in the treeless savanna

I wouldn't call that an upward bound nor can I resist pointing out that a lot of wusses start complaining much earlier than that but ~so what ~? Is there a point to this wild goose chase?

Well, I think it's great that you are coming out of your shell. I don't know about everybody else but I think it would be especially enlightening if you could provide us more details as to how HE defended themselves against sabertoothed cats and packs of bear-sized hyena? Please provide us as many gemlike details as your heart desires.

Re: Michael Clark, would you like to make a retraction?

So when you finally do get around to *substance* , we discover that all that McGinnian posturing was just that. Would you like me to say that I'm surprised?

Well, honestly, to be surprised one must first have some understanding. So, I guess you could say that I'd be surprised if you were truly surprised. But I'm willing to let you indulge the fantasy.

I think it is becoming more and more obvious that the lack of thought that comes from you is truly indicative of a lack of understanding.

You're way out of your league here, Dimmy. Maybe you should get into creative writing or some sort of poetry/performance art....?

I wouldn't pretend to compete with your imagination. Unfortunately my thinking is grounded in reality. I could not, for example, even begin to imagine hominids out-running lion and hyena.

It is becoming more and more apparent why you are so threatened by AAT.
