David,
you and Ken are making a huge mistake believing that an assumption from which you start your argumentation in anyway could and can be used as proof. What's been done from your side as well as from others who believe the VM to be a forgery, is to forget that nothing what so ever has been put on the table which can be used against VM no matter if you refer to anatase – which exists in same size in nature for example in parts of Norway, outside a monastery in England as well as in two areas in the Alps close to monasteries; or it's your fictive trying to argue a double ink – as long as the ink hasn't been identified, as long as double ink hasn't been proven to exist, there is no way anyone using scholarly methods can use that against VM!
AND
That's basic argumentation methods limits you are trying to 'walk over'. You can't.
