Why is it that today's astronomers no longer care for the thirst for knowledge?

Why is it more important to have a shiny expensive scope than to teach the kid next door?

Why is it that the price of scopes is more important than the value of what you do with it?

What happened to the ideal that it doesn't matter what the scope is made of, it matters how well you use it?

What happened to the Sidewalk Astronomers ideal? Any old material good optics and SHOW THE STARS TO THE WORLD!

Why do people think they should ignore the past? So they can improve their collection?

Why do they have a freaking collection of telescopes that are so empty inside that possession is all they know? Stop collecting them, start using them.

Troll no rant yes
