If such a child was in fact sentenced to Hell, would I even know it if I were in Heaven? Like I was explaining to Karl, there's going to be no pain of any kind in Heaven, so this may be handled by erasing that person from your memories, etc. As a human being, I just can't conceive how it will be done, no one can. I don't think the memory would be erased, but that is a possibility. Of course, it may be that we will be aware of all who are there and not and simply accept it. Remember, we will be quite a different kind of being as a spirit as the Bible says.

Now you're showing sarcasm and I of course disagree. Keep in mind that there will be a time when Satan and all of his followers are eliminated from existence totally, so eternal suffering won't last forever, evil will simply be gone. Like I was telling someone else, you have been taught the Word. Whether you choose to believe it or not is totally up to you. If you do, and you accept God and try your best to live as he indicates, your reward will be eternal life. If not, you suffer the consequences by being denied entrance to Heaven and becoming a resident of Hell. I'm not saying this, it has been written. You can criticize me all you want or make excuses, but I won't be judging you; that's up to someone much more qualified than I.

Actually, I'm not all that perturbed by the obvious lack of believers I find here. Christ showed everything he had and people still didn't believe, so this attitude is to be expected. Yet God, unlike myself if I were in his place, continues to show great patience and an interest in the beings he created. Eventually though, that patience will end and we will all witness the final results.
