You mean the striking workers. That is class war for you. By the way he was rich long before he had the strikers fired upon.

Of course he was rich long before, because he had the same mindset. That incident was only the top of the iceberg.

The point is that the most successful businessman it is not the smartest, nor the more hardworking guy, nor the more educated nor a combination of them.

But the more hypocritical. A successful businessman should be able to hurt others for him to make a profit. As much he have the guts to do that, as successful he become. It is more important for a businessman to lie, cheat and other things like that than to be smart or hardworking.

This is the whole point. It is nothing really to admire to a CEO. Because he become wealthy by preventing others to live decently out of their own work.
