

Re: Deflation on the doorstep

Source: <http://sci.tech-archive.net/Archive/sci.econ/2007-06/msg00241.html>

- From: Davinchi <mulldrat@xxxxxxxxxxxxxxxx>
 - Date: Fri, 29 Jun 2007 18:45:46 -0400
-

taxationistheft2003@xxxxxxxx wrote:

I am always amazed that supposedly intelligent people still support the heavy hand of government interference. I suppose it's because so many economists receive a government paycheck; that makes them a biased source.

The university environment seems to be poisonous to individual freedom and common sense. Hopefully, the deflationary depression, caused by the credit bubble and now credit crunch, will leave these statisticians unemployed and unemployable.

you can just tell from your email address what you think.

But in truth, only some taxation could ever possibly be considered theft. In fact both theory and practice suggests that taxes are a means of funding "public goods", large long running capital projects, to maintain an organized marketplace, and to provide a safety net.

examples are: civil defense, the interstate highway system, the money supply (using money instead of barter), and disaster relief (such as, say Katrina, mmmmmm bad example, lets say literally – the Coast Guard saving millionaires from their sinking yachts because they ran into a reef while bombed on Johny Walker Red).

death and taxes my friend, death and taxes.

--

.... "Esse Quam Videri" == "to be rather than to seem."

.