I have a friend who was doing research on an environmental catastrophe in Woburn, Mass. when he began coming under surveillance. He has no criminal history or anything to warrant such surveillance. As he researched through the microfilm, plainclothes men began looking over his shoulder or parked behind him at a table or watching him from a balcony above. When asked who they were or why they were observing him, they did not answer. One day 2 such men began taking pictures of him and then ran away.

Following this, men in suits began following him as well as plainclothes men. The men in suits wore dark navy blue or black solid or lightly pinstriped suits, white shirts, and pink/red/ other colors standard ties. The men in suits were older, perhaps in mid-to late 50s in age and the plainclothes ones a mix of younger and about the same age. This was witnessed on several occasions by different people.

At the same time the man began getting concerns from friends that his phone was being tampered with, as people answered when he was away (he lived alone) or false messages that the phone was disconnected were broadcast to incoming calls. Prospective employers reported similar activity. the men appeared to act singly or jointly and appeared only to be intimidating the man.

The man then became subject to IRS audits and levies (1 year owed $200), missing money from his Fleet bank account (never was explained by any rep at any time nor was credit made to the accounts. Fleet actually bounced his checks, charged fees, then reported him to NCPS after the money went missing). Checks paying creditors disappeared at the Federal reserve level (confirmed by credit card company). This was back in the late 1990s and still goes on periodically.
