

Re: you probably knew about this already...

Source: <http://sci.tech-archive.net/Archive/sci.electronics.design/2004-10/1486.html>

From: John Larkin (jjlarkin_at_highSNIPlandTHIStechPLEASEnology.com)

Date: 10/04/04

Date: Mon, 04 Oct 2004 13:26:17 -0700

On Mon, 04 Oct 2004 16:13:24 -0400, Spehro Pefhany
<speffSNIP@interlogDOTyou.knowwhat> wrote:

>On Mon, 04 Oct 2004 20:56:33 +0200, the renowned Stefan Heinzmann

><stefan_heinzmann@yahoo.com> wrote:

>

>>John Larkin wrote:

>>><http://www.alldatasheet.com/>

>>

>>Seen it, but considered it useless. I never got a pdf file out of it.

>>Clicking on the download button just got me to another index page. Is >>there a trick?

>

>Clicking on the underlined part number to the right of the Download

>"button" (which does nothing) and to the left of the blue "Click here"

>(which also does nothing) should open the data sheet within a frame.

>There's another part number at the bottom that acts the same.

>

>They all seem to end up called "datasheet.pdf" when you go to save >them, but they can be saved from Acrobat, at least with my setup

>(Firefox browser and Acrobat 5.0.5 plugin). I don't see any way to do >the "right click and save" thing.

>

>If I try to do it from Internet Explorer, it tries to install some >software called "Datasheet", which I decline, but it still seems to >work the same.

>

>

Hmmm... I never noticed any attempted installs with my setup. But IE installs (and runs!) everything it can, by default. I don't have any problem with cookies... the internet really wouldn't work right without them.

John