The problem the industry content owners are trying to thwart is high quality A/V content copying and theft, and or even bit-for-bit theft of high quality A/V content.

No they want to encourage theft,(as long as it is not from their warehouses), the more people steal the more royalties the content owners collect. What they want to discourage is copying (wether it is legal or not to copy). To this end they try to sell the line that copyright infringement is theft.

By any legal definition it is not.
