

Re: Evil Designers Guide to Copying Patents

Source: <http://sci.tech--archive.net/Archive/sci.electronics.design/2007-03/msg05755.html>

- From: krw <krw@xxxxxxxxxx>
 - Date: Wed, 21 Mar 2007 15:34:09 -0400
-

In article <4601876d$0$5656$edfadb0f@xxxxxxxxxxxxxxxxxxxxxxxx>, frithiof.jensen@xx says...

"D from BC" <myrealaddress@xxxxxxxx> wrote in message news:Oks203tquq66rg6292s6e3k009na47iol7@xxxxxxxx

I'm going to tick off some patent owners. :P

Just Keep It Simple and Stupid:

Set up two businesses. A holding company and a subsidiary. The subsidiary rips the patent, manufactures and sell the goods produced. But that is not all it does.

It also pays high interest on the junk bonds it issued to the holding company and "private investors" financing the startup – probably close to what the accountant knows will piss off the tax authorities for certain. It never really makes any profit.

When the lawsuit comes, the subsidiary cannot pay and goes tits-up. With luck the executers will burn whatever assets remain, nobody gets anything for their trouble and an example has been made.

<snip>

As long as you're going to be engaging in fraud, why bother with patents? Wouldn't, say, banking be easier?

—
Keith