I guess the problem isn't so much of lack of speed where they were being used, they seem to exhibit random unwanted behavior in some of our logging and database applications where data isn't fully log ect. Peach Tree database seems to ring a bell as one of the troubled areas on Vista which is suppose to be Vista ready..

Being the idiot that you are, I would say that you are so stupid, you are likely trying to install it on mass purchased, bare bones, 5 year old junk that barely runs XP, much less anything more powerful.

Did I say I was in the IT department? That goes to show just how well you actually pay attention.

I'm fully confident that our IT techs can blow smoke around you any day.

I STILL contend that dopes, even those that claim to be in IT departments, that have problems with Vista, are dopes that create their own operator error level faults, and are too stupid to see that it is their own inept lack of capability that keeps them from getting anywhere.

Peach Tree, is so lame, they still think they are running as an underlying DOS based app. I have seen a lot of "accounting" packages and MRP packages that are so damned old when they were first authored that the LAZY company that started them are to cheap to actually do a REAL Windows compliant re-write, which is what they need. So sure, a modern OS might puke a little bit on keeping a barely compliant, non-modernized app from running all the time correctly.

Even the screen forms they present are old ASCII looking DOS app looking stupidity. I could always tell when a company was a money grubbing bunch of jerks, and when they had a REAL product.

Hire a REAL database guru, and PORT your stupid accounting mistake choice to a REAL database. Stop blaming everything OLD on something NEW.

Oh give me a break!...

Just for you.
