Not often we agree but yes, it's damn well time it did. Plus I have no objection to using military force to get the job done. With the 'toys' our boys have it shouldn't be too much trouble. I'd worry about the captive crews though. Some way has to be found of avoiding injury to them. On the ground intelligence is probably what's needed first.

I like toys, but I don't have enough confidence in them to believe, that they will just make disappear pirates.

If there's not many governments playing together, a lot of money being invested and taken care, that not some high up people are themselves involved in the pirate games, there might be success.

If not, then I think this is far too optimistic.

Didn't we already hear already about some other situations, some other toys and some other 'shouldn't be too much trouble' statements?

In most cases the initially estimated costs in 'solving a problem'
were far off.

However I fully agree, that 'the pirate problem has to be seriously attacked' and not just with two thee 'goodwill flagships' which are merely there to show off, but which are by far not sufficient to threaten any pirate.

under a weak leader, besides the fact that it invites more shenanigans, the weak leader will not take definitive action to solve the problem, but will instead negotiate and make one-sided concessions to placate them.

I think that the real situation is indeed far worse. See this from a reliably far right publication:

I presume you are jesting ?:-) Arianna Huffington is house madam and
