I think I've found your problem.

Wow, how original.

Hey kid, if this thing worked, why haven't there been any produced yet. I'm sure JW will pipe up and say he saw it, but from just looking at his post one can tell he is quite ill. If you think the oil companies suppress this technology, then what makes you think they won't come after you? What's that you say, "they don't know who I am", well that didn't stop them from shutting down every other nut case on the web. But then again, just maybe this thing never worked. But that's beyond your comprehension. You're in training to be the next JW. Email him and I'm sure he can give you some tips (like tax evasion).

Bottom line: Faraday's Law ain't broke.

Electrolysis is inherently useless for bulk hydrogen because of its staggering loss of exergy. There ALWAYS will be more intelligent things to do with high value electricity (such as grid, wind, or solar) than instantly and irreversibly destroying most of its value.
