Use of the present tense (as in "USOAL sells affordable hydrogen") is somewhat premature isn't it ?

No, you can enter into a contract with us to buy hydrogen from any of our sites currently under construction, or engage us to build a custom plant to meet your needs.

Until you're shipping hydrogen, use of the present tense as above is indeed premature.

It should be "USOAL is building plant to make hydrogen to sell".

How are the early PV cells working out btw ?

Re: At Last – Low Cost Pollution Free Hydrogen a Reality

I'm selling hydrogen today. So, saying you can buy hydrogen from me today is quite accurate.

I bought a red sofa for a lady friend a few years ago. I went to the store, looked at the sofa, she selected it, and I paid for it. It was delivered 10 weeks later. Yet she thanked me for buying her the sofa that day, and the salesperson said I made a wise choice with my purchase.

I bought a Porsche some years ago that I wanted, and the dealer took my deposit and arranged financing and it took 12 weeks to get the car I had ordered – delivered at the dealership – before I could drive it off. Yet everyone I knew was excited by my purchase that day.

ChevronTexaco discovered an oil field in 1986, and didn't start developing it until 10 years later. Then they went through a 3 phase process to develop it to its full potential. They got money to develop this field by selling what they thought they could produce from the field based on their best estimates. They sold a commodity DECADES before they actually shipped product.

In all cases, these folks would run afoul of your grammatical rules. Yet people routinely speak and act in this way when making major purchases.

So, its your understanding of reality, or rather, your penchant to spin whatever I say or do in the most negative light possible, that is the issue, not the reality of what I am doing today.
