Good, then let's hope he has all the protection he needs to access websites as well, since they are where the really serious virus and work risks generally are found.

Out of simple curiosity, do you really not grasp the need for having a properly designed firewall on your computer, along with nearly continuously updated virus detection and elimination products? These things are not free!

Are you too dumb to even realize that today email is not the major threat, and in fact is a relatively minor contributor to the problem. That is unless you are stupid enough to download a compressed, executable file (like a .zip) coming from an unknown source?

Are you really that dense?

Don't you also realize that when you are connected to the net using high-speed cable access, your computer is on-line whenever it is turned on, and that unless protected by a trusted firewall any malicious person is able to plant a virus or worm in your computer without you even realizing that it had happened?

Duh!

Your ignorance of computers appears to roughly equal your ignorance of science, which makes you the perfect target for scam artists.

By the way Junior Dummy, perhaps you would like to cite how I "warned off Dan", given that Dan is sharp enough to reach his own conclusions based on "facts" handed to him.

Idiot!
