OK so the urban area isn't pre-loaded in the 2gig area? What about POIs? I guess that's what the user memory could be used for.

> what kind of area does 140mb get you?

>>From what I understand, basically about 1 western european country (or maybe 2 Belguim size ones?). So depending on how granular you can be with your map selection AND how in-flexible you want to be in your planning you might be able to get away with it.

Of course if you're going on short trips or repeated trips to the same area such as for business it's less of an issue. But think of how great a unit this could be for the summer backpacker if it had an SD card slot, or even euro spec memory? Why sell a unit who's basic function is travel yet give it market specific characteristics? It's like making a suitcase that only fits inside north american airplanes.

For the cost of the SD reader hardware why didn't Garmin make it unlimited? Even XD memory (like Fuji and Olympus cameras use) with it's smaller format could be an option.
