Sometimes it's a matter of who has the most money and the best attorneys.

If you wanted to get a legal opinion, you'd have to have Garmin take somebody to court. If you wanted 2 different opinions, you'd have to have 2 people (or the same one) taken to 2 different courts, hahaha.

There are literally thousands of "homemade" maps available for upload into Garmin and other receivers, and I have yet to see it reported that Garmin has dragged any of these individuals into a courtroom.

The way I see it, the greater the availability of maps of all kinds, the better it is for the Garmin GPS sales business. Why would they actively discourage this?

I know they sell maps, but I'll bet they don't make much money from it, and probably only do it to encourage receiver sales.
