The following has been submitted for inclusion in EDICT/JMdict:

>Q< [dQ<] /(v1) to hunt a spy/to have a tail appendage/

Well as already said the word is from Œ'ØQ< (most often written with that kanji) and the kanji is from >LY<

Yes, I saw some instances of Œ'>Q<.

I don't think you need an Edict entry for it unless you plan to include Ãd _d
a much more popular "word" based on the same type of kanji substitution.

I think both are worth recording. People are going to, er, come across them, and they should be able to look them up. Yes, Ãd is far more common.
