"Operatunity", I take it then, is a British production? Your original posting was sadly deficient in providing context.

"in the US," "Pop Idol," and "Tesco's" are all unmistakable markers of UKism.

I'll give you 1.5 out of 3: 'Tesco's' is a dead giveaway, but 'in the US', even combined with an English-language title, still allows an Australian source, for instance.

Then there's that thing called memory: anyone to whom the information is interesting must have followed the recent thread and know what it's about.

Only if you are using 'must' in the sense of 'might'.

I honestly believe no one else cares whether the gal bagged the goods or not.
