First, you suggested two people were enough for a community.

Two people certainly isn't enough for an infant to acquire a language!

Go learn some psycholinguistics.

So what about people who grow up in one speech community, but acquire another language from immigrant parents (sometimes just one parent, in a linguistically mixed marriage?), with minimal reinforcement from other speakers?. Is their speech automatically deficient?

I don't recall ever coming across a description of such a situation in the literature.

I could give you a literature list, but of course, you cannot be bothered to read one single book.
