Lithuanian taika (peace) is related to Serbian tiho, tih (quiet, tacit) and tiaina (silence) and Serbian tiho is related to other Serbian words as disanje (breathing), duh (ghost), duaa (soul); cf. Serbian udahnuti (inspire); iz--dahnuti (expire), utihnuti (to get quiet).

Would you try to make a similar comparison in Baltic? Maybe you could begin with Lith. dvasia (soul, ghost) and Latv. dv sele (soul)?

I don't understand what you are attempting here..
Are you trying to have me improve upon the Lithuanian--Serbian correspondences that you have already made?

You would hardly be able to understand the relation between Lithuanian dvelksmas (breathing) and the word taika (peace) if there were not the Serbian (Slavic) words disanje (breathing), tiaina (peace) and all the other Serbian words I mentioned above.

Anyway... back to basics.
The Latvian 'mir' pre--existed the Slavic one.
(How Russian subsequently confused 'peace' with 'the world' is beyond me)

Nonsense!
