

Re: Canadian doctors coming to the US

Source: <http://sci.tech-archive.net/Archive/sci.med.cardiology/2004-08/2756.html>

From: Lictor (ghostmlNOSPAM-REMOVE_at_online.fr)

Date: 08/28/04

Date: Sat, 28 Aug 2004 16:47:49 +0200

"Steve Harris sbharris@ROMAN9.netcom.com" <sbharris@ix.netcom.com> wrote in message news:79cf0a8.0408271437.492111bc@posting.google.com...

- > I've got some shocking news for you, you poor dear innocent things.
- > The decision of what particular drug you take for your illness is in
- > many cases a lot like the decision of what kind of food to eat, or car
- > to drive.

I don't drive a car, as I can afford not to, thanks to a good public transport policy.

The problem is that I can make my own decision. I don't need to be treated by a kid by some ads that think they can try to bully me into buying their drugs. The problem is that, if I lived in the USA, I would pay for these ads with buying that drug. And if I compared how much you pay for your drug and how much I do pay for the very same drug, I would say these ads are worth around 90% of the price of the drug. Now, why would I want to pay that much money for something that is not even helpfull in my decision process? Actually, for something I have to actively eliminate during my decision process...

- > The food and the car can kill you also, if you choose "wrongly."

Yes, but that's my own decision. I'm not forced to buy a car – I actually consciously decided not to. Likewise, I'm not forced to buy any kind of food. Advertisements should plainly don't exist. I mean, they provide no information to help me with taking a decision. Why should I pay for them then? When you advertise, you are actually forcing me to buy a service (the "information" on the ads) I have no desire for, because don't be fooled and think that you're not the one paying for these ads in the end.

I never opted in to be subjected to ads, and I'm given no way to opt out either. Yet, I'm forced to pay the cost of ads with any product I buy. This is a form of forced sale, and that is illegal.

- > But that's part of being an adult, n'est-ce pas vrai?
- > Unless you are Canadian.

Being an adult doesn't mean being an American. It means being able to make your own decisions, based on your own convictions. Not the ones of the sci.med.cardiology: Re: Canadian doctors coming to the US society you live in, or the official line of thinking, or what the party told me to think. You should try that sometimes... But of course, Big Brother is always right, and it's the rest of the world that is un-American and doesn't like your "freedom of thinking"..