First off I really don't know or care if you have been reading everything I have posted in the past.

The elderly have had a full life and that is where you start thinking about what will take them in the end. My parents suffered from prolonged illness that took their lives. If I could pick as to what to succumb to then I would pick a blown valve, similar to John Ritter, which I have problems with. Quick and painless.

It is a different story when talking about somebody young with many more years ahead of them. I don't believe in scaring people who have not had any symptoms related to any drug intack into stopping their meds that may save their life.

In the end saving an elderly from a heart attack means cancer, ALS, Alzeimners may be in sight. Which is worse?

You always strive for the quality of life. That's just my personal point of view that I don't have any studies to back me up with and not trying to talk anybody else into accepting. It is not specific to statins.
