It seems to me I heard somewhere that Andrew B. Chung, MD/PhD wrote in article <1174429099.132784.8840@xx>:

Andrew, in the Holy Spirit, boldly wrote:

True, if *"below the most populous city"* means "270 miles away from Tokyo;" the earthquake was farther FROM Tokyo than it was below the surface.

It remains the right way to describe this earthquake.

If by "right way" you mean something that is absurd on its face. The earthquake was 270 miles away from Tokyo horizontally and 255 miles away vertically. Using the magic of science and mathematics, it's easy to see that is a straight line distance of about 370 miles from Tokyo.

By horizontal distance alone, that would be like an earthquake of similar magnitude happening beneath Florence, SC or Pensacola, FL.

Throw in the straight line distance of 370 miles and you're talking about the effects in Atlanta of a 6.0 earthquake near the surface somewhere out beyond Biloxi (351 miles).

For those less familiar with the Eastern US, that would be like the effect of a 6.0 earthquake 40 miles north of San Francisco on downtown Los Angeles; i.e., none. The 7.1 Loma Prieta earthquake of 1989 was 60 miles south of San Francisco and was not even felt in Los Angeles although it caused extensive damage in the San Francisco Bay area.

Science and common sense seem to be on my side of the argument (again), Doctor.
