I made general comment about web sites like toxicteeth, not any one specific story. Your reply to my comments was...

"You want to bet $1000 that the information posted is accurate?"

Re: link about Chet and the CA Dental Board

As I wrote, if you want to take up the task of proving to me and others that these web sites are 100% accurate, I'll take that bet.

I'll remind you, for what is either the third or 4th time, I did not question the validity of the information, my comment was only that these web sites seem to be accepted as truth despite the fact many are sponsored by companies or individuals who stand to profit from the views they espouse. If I linked to a site that was allegedly a volunteer group of concerned citizens FOR amalgam, and you found the web site was actually owned by a company that made or profited from the results, you would be 100% correct in being somewhat suspect of the motivation behind these "volunteers". All I am asking is why that is not a concern here?. A few years ago I pointed out that a similar relationship existed between IAOMT and its director, who happened to be president of a company that stood to profit from the information reported by the IAOMT.
