Officials say avian flu bound to hit Europe

August 5, 2005

Russia

MOSCOW — Russian authorities, struggling to contain an outbreak of avian flu that has killed thousands of birds in Siberia, yesterday acknowledged that a spread of the virus into Europe seems almost inevitable. "It is quite likely that the flu will creep westward. What else can it do? The infection is picking up momentum," said Viktor Maleyev, deputy director of the Russian Health Ministry's Institute of Epidemiology. Equally worrying, health officials confirmed that the outbreak includes a strain that has been known to affect humans. Scientists fear that expansion of the virus's geography increases the chances of a major outbreak within the human population. Some poultry farms on the west side of the Ural Mountains are under precautionary alerts. (Los Angeles Times)
