This from the IDSA website— It starts with "Clinical Assessment", and contains detailed information on why "subjective" symptoms need not be consider in Lyme diagnosis.

See this, Cod?

"OBJECTIVE

The objectives of these practice guidelines are to provide clinicians and other health care practitioners with recommendations for treatment of patients in the United States with suspected or established Lyme disease, HGA (formerly known as human granulocytic ehrlichiosis), or babesiosis. In addition, recommendations are provided for prevention of these infections, all of which may be transmitted by certain species of Ixodes ticks. The panel performed an extensive review of all of the randomized, controlled trials and open-label trials published in peer-reviewed, English-language journals. Previously published and widely accepted criteria were used to grade the quality of the evidence on which the recommendations were based (table 1) [2, 3]".

See, for you and the LDA and others who are reading impaired...what that says is that the objective here is to provide GUIDELINES for the TREATMENT of LYME DISEASE and other tickborne diseases.

Understand?

Treatment.
