<<You have that right. If you didn't like something you were asked to do on the job, refusal to do it can cost your job>>

If one was an employee, this seems reasonable to me. I have had to stand up to being asked to do something dishonest in the past and say no and take the risk of getting fired.

The way I look at it, if they weren't willing to take the risk of being fired for it, it couldn't have been that strong of a belief, could it?
