

Re: Humiliation redefined

---

Source: <http://sci.tech-archive.net/Archive/sci.med.transcription/2006-02/msg00293.html>

---

- From: Romy <Romy.22pzak@xxxxxxxxxxx>
  - Date: Sat, 4 Feb 2006 12:59:50 -0600
-

Diane,

My DD just returned this morning with my booty from Trader Joe's.

I remember one time when we were going to Boston and looking in a tour book, and there was a little blurb about how people loved Trader Joe's and how it was so unique. So we decided to go there, even though we were taking public transportation around, so we couldn't buy much. Ever since then we always seek them out when traveling and often they are located right off interstates so easy to get off the freeway then back on. They are a health food store (for lack of a better description) that carries virtually ALL their own house brands of items and practically everything you buy from them is not only cheaper than you can get at any grocery store but also delicious and organic. They have organic meats and produce sections too. One time I got a beautiful about-to-bloom orchid with five flower stalks for $14. My cousin lives near one and I asked her why she liked them so much also, and she said because everything you buy is cheap and great. What's not to like?

BTW I'm thinking of buying TJ stock. They have a website but they don't sell on line. They do have store locations there though.

dianne7619@xxxxxxxxxxx Wrote:

Mine is always sending e-mails from allrecipes.com too! She is a really good cook, but she works 8-5 and her husband works the night shift and has to be at work at 7:00, so he cooks and has it ready when she walks in, so I get more phone calls from him about cooking than from her. Ha.

What is Trader Joe's?

Romy wrote:

There's no greater feeling of satisfaction than this kind of relationship with the daughters, I swear. My youngest DD, age 22,

loves

Re: Humiliation redefined

to cook also and practically lives on allrecipes.com. She's always trying something new and exotic. This afternoon she called me from Trader Joe's (there isn't one around here, but she's in Massachusetts)

to ask if there's anything I want. I love that place!

dianne7619@xxxxxxxxxx Wrote:

I sent my 28-year-old daughter the recipe for my mother's cloverleaf dinner rolls. She made them and called me to ask why I didn't just put a piece of parchment paper down on the countertop when I was kneading

them (it's always a huge mess, and I have to use a scraper to get some of it off).

I make these rolls about every 3 days because youngest DD is addicted

to them, and I've made them regularly for almost 30 years. Now

why did it take an engineer to point that out to me? So this morning I tried

it. My face is still red. It worked great.

Re: Humiliation redefined

—
Romy

—
Romy

.