Theoretically a murder case is always open. It may go cold and be on the back burner, but if someone comes up with a credible tip they do need to follow it. Whoever committed the crime could still be alive now 31 years later, and brought to justice. I don't think they necessarily are spending oodles of time on it, just following a lead now that has popped up, and since it's such a high profile case that Hoffa has become synonymous with completely mystery, of course the press is all over it.

I was wondering the same thing.

Can someone explain why we are still searching for the remains of a man that disappeared in 1975??

Surely the FBI has important things on their agenda? Smarter things to do with their money??
