My interest in that department died about 10 years ago, seriously. It just died. No interest, nothing excites it. When I see an actor that I like I think I would like to talk about things going on in the world, poverty, global warming, the war, --- never do I see, think, desire anything else from anyone. It is just not there. It is dead, gone, caput. And I don't miss it. Loved it when it was here --- but am fine without it. I am not even that much of a huggy person anymore --- it kind of bothers me (that I think is because then I have to smell like someone's perfume or Downey all day). I sometimes wonder if it is my OCD cleanliness thing. MD mentioned I may have to have platelets transfused and I am fretting about getting "cooties" and germs (don't even worry about serious diseases just actually getting someone's "GERMS" ) so seriously doubt I would do it. I have certainly become a rather manic germaphobe lately. Some days worse than others and I never used to fret about transfusions but with all my allergies and my freaking allergies to fragrances I can just see getting someone's smelly germs (VBG). I will have to have it multi-filtered!!! Damn, I'm itching just thinking about it!

Bam, that reminds me of a comment my editor made about an older female character in my book.

MY WORDS: The recruiter just stood there watching Jessie examine Walker ever so slowly. He saw her start at his boss's long legs and bring her eyes up inch by inch. Now and then, she would hesitate to more fully explore an interesting section of his anatomy then continue, ever upward.

MY EDITOR'S COMMENT: You know, women--even of child-bearing age--seldom do this lingering scan upward the way men do; I find it hard to imagine from an 87-year-old, no matter how sexual she continues to be.

So, how many of you women, no matter what your age, do like to examine a fine specimen of a man in this way now and then? Come on, be honest, even if you do it without his knowledge. I have, particularly when he's walking away and has a nice...well, you get the idea.

Men, hush up! I can be a dirty old lady if I want.
