

Re: Credit Card Question

Source: <http://sci.tech-archive.net/Archive/sci.med.transcription/2006-12/msg00239.html>

- From: RaeMorrill <RaeMorrill@xxxxxxx>
 - Date: Sun, 03 Dec 2006 15:38:15 GMT
-

I've said it before – we have a horrible mail lady here. There have been numerous complaints and nothing is done. I'm not sure if the PM just gives lip service to having heard complaints or if she's truly tried to get anything done.

Barbara Carlson wrote:

Absolutely right. I wouldn't complain about the prices if the service was even adequate! But the service is so bad that if it could be outsourced it would probably improve! The language barrier couldn't be any worse!

It also varies from place to place. When we lived in NJ in a little town we had a very conscientious postmistress and we had really excellent service for the 27 years we lived there. Not so in any other places we have lived.

Barb C.

"Marsha" <mas@xxxxxxx> wrote in message
news:V_ydnc1eRoa6Se_YnZ2dnUVZ_s-dnZ2d@xxxxxxxxxxxxxxxxxxxxxxxx

Don't get me started on our mail service.
First we're lucky if anybody can understand or speak English down there.

A couple of weeks ago I mailed some important papers to my BIL in Central Florida. The address was completely correct, except I had transposed 2 numbers in the zip
code, and they returned it "no such address".
If I had left the zip off it probably would have been delivered.

With so much mail now by e-mail, and checks (which used to be my highest postage use) electronically transferred I want to know why the number of employees at our post office have increased! It may cost more per item to send less, but it doesn't take more people to handle it!

Re: Credit Card Question

Barb C.

Postal employees are paid very well and have excellent benefits. I figure the increasing postage costs reflect mostly that and increased fuel costs, but no matter—email communications and package delivery competition have to be hitting them hard. They're pretty much pricing themselves out of work.

"The times, they are a-changing..."

Anne/OH

And you can't outsource mail carriers.

Marsha