Well hey, y'all. :) I moved in October or November. Got a new boyfriend who was to be the be--all, end--all, but alas -- he is as crazy as I am. We prop each other up like a couple of 3--legged chairs. LOL. He moved out on 12/1. I survived. I didn't hear a word from him and was very hurt about it, but I survived. Then on Christmas Eve he called and came over. Boy were my kids ever mad, but if there is one thing he's taught me, it's to be SELFISH for once -- and not in a bad way, but in a way that takes care of ME. I had so many doormat years that it has been hard for me, but I'm learning. He came back the day after Christmas and has been here ever since. I don't know if that's bad or good, but we are making it. When he lived here before, we had major sleep issues -- those of you who live alone, beware of sleeping in the same bed with somebody (especially somebody on CPAP). It can be terrible -- but since he has been living here again, we've been okay with it.

Work is BAD. I have no work and my goal today is to find another IC position so that I can tread water and figure out what's going to happen with the two companies I work for, before I make a commitment. Anybody got any work? I have about 200 years' experience, LOL. I'm even thinking about a full--time gig. I'd do something other than MT but I don't know how to do anything else.

BF, my daughter, grandson and I live in a small house right up on the road. I can see who leaves Susie's store with beer, and when the gasoline prices change. It's very entertaining, in that way. I have no pets and don't want any right now. I don't think I'm capable of even remembering to feed a goldfish.

But -- for all that whining -- I am more content than I have ever been in my life. I have that "normal" life I always wanted. DH and I were never still for a minute, and now I watch TV every night, which is kind of amazing. Of course I will probably wind up working some in the evenings, but that will be okay too -- I did it for years.

I'm glad you started this, Jeannie. I wonder about everybody, every day.
