

Re: A few silly questions

Re: A few silly questions

Source: <http://sci.tech-archive.net/Archive/sci.physics/2007-02/msg03438.html>

- From: "Wayne Dobson" <nospam@xxxxxxxxxxxxxx>
 - Date: Thu, 22 Feb 2007 19:55:14 GMT
-

"Androcles" <Engineer@xxxxxxxxxxxxxxxxxxxxxxxx> wrote in message
news:1Q8Dh.40\$HO5.30@xxxxxxxxxxxxxxxxxxxxxxxxxxxxxxxx

I could have done that alot earlier, but I chose not to leave him and some others to their own stupidity, because they chose to force the issue and pressure me silent. That's the kind of thing that makes me vocal. This isn't about who knows the most Physics – there's no contest. He keeps calling me stupid, despite the fact that I run rings around him, when he talks about what he knows little about. I thought I'd cut him some slack and let him prove what he could do, employing his specialist subject. He still managed to make a pig's ear of what should have been a slam-dunk.
A
very poor performance indeed.

Then have fun with muggles, it's your call. I only make suggestions, I don't tell people what to do (other than to tell muggles to fuck off, of course, but they don't listen anyway and they are not people, they are knuckle-dragging Neanderthal apes).
If you wish to discuss physics don't bother with muggles, see a wizard or another elf. Remember that we are outnumbered by muggles.

I wasn't intending to learn Physics from a parrot. I'd rather read a book. He brought an irrelevant amount of Physics into a discussion that didn't warrant it, with the intention of drawing me into an area of ignorance, in an attempt to make look a fool. I thought I'd humour him and let him try. After all, he has been talking nonsense about martial arts, an area which he knows little about. I thought it would be interesting to establish if it was his ignorance that was making act slippery and sound stupid. It appears to be something innate, rather than an accident brought on by circumstance.

--
AKA "Dobbie The House Elf"

Re: A few silly questions