True.

What
happens
next is the innovation.

You have variables
(yes, you
can call
them
whatever
you want)
in a computer
program,
changing
according to a set of rules, and
then
through the resulting complexity
you find a
set of
information,
a
second
set of
information
apart from the original
information
held in the variables.

The last
step is to

with experiments.

Forgot to add.

The last step is to falsify the computer program (a nicely contained
mathematical hypothesis)
with experiments by predictions from the second set of information, information that is not stored
numerically in the variables, but found more abstractly within the
complexity.

Complete and utter goddamn word salad,
from start to finish.

Word salad. Nice meme. Good protector.

You throw around buzzwords like complexity as an attempt to shove everything you cannot explain and do not understand under the rug.

Buzzword. Nother good protector.

Re: If someone just took a minute to listen to me

I understand complexity.

Go into denial.

Your still spouting the same idiotic bullshit as before.
Go away again.

Stay in denial.

Hey, I got my wish.

Denial of what?

That I understand enough about complexity to suggest a novel use for it.

Since you haven't demonstrated an understanding, denial is OK.
Especially since you have spent four years showing you do not understand.
