BTW; why are your diverting back into your cloak and dagger spookology borg mode of all in one paragraph story telling?

The regular laws of physics seem to more than back up my observationology, as well as to my subjectively interpreting upon what looks somewhat if not entirely artificial about Venus. Equally my focus upon our moon seems to beg for the truth and nothing but the truth which obviously isn't possible until your fat lady sings and them Apollo cows come home.

BTW No.2;

I never suggested that ETs specifically moved an entire planet into our solar system. Though I'd suppose if two solar systems were sufficiently nearby one another, having a good Oort to Oort contest of wits and will to survive, and if ETs could have taken advantage of that opportunity as to improve upon the odds of safely transferring a planet and perhaps sharing a spare moon or two over to our less testy solar system, then I'd suppose it's possible that ETs had something to contribute that's part of whom we are.

It's true that Venus is geologically hot (thereby not entirely greenhouse hot) and otherwise somewhat humanly nasty to boot, which has absolutely nothing to do with others as locals or perhaps ETs making a go of it because, it's simply not too hot and nasty for applied physics to survive, even on behalf of assisting other forms of local life as having evolved in order to have survived in spite of our being so continually dumbfounded. Venus wasn't always that hot and nasty, whereas the craters we see simply didn't transpire after having to get all the way through that much of a surrounding atmospheric ocean as for defending the surface from all but the platinum class of meteors, which may have existed, although 8~9 g/cm³ is most likely the sort of density which would hardly have made a noticeable dent, much less a significant crater after getting itself through that thick soup of the day.

Temperature and pressure are each relative to your frame of existence.
>>From the outside looking in upon Venus it's not such a nice place for naked humans, such as is the same analogy applies for us humans looking at the life thriving within our deep oceans isn't exactly reassuring as for that wet and nasty environment sustaining our form of life as under such lethal amounts of water, that which somewhat sucks because we've humans have got to deal with the incest mutation likes of GW Bush and the fish do not.

Besides failing to contribute as to resolving any good number of issues, instead you're the one that's continually going out of your less than godly ways and means as per excluding viable evidence and, otherwise skewing even your own conditional laws of physics in order to suit your pagan mainstream mindset of dastardly motives and hidden agendas. I have no such ulterior motives nor hidden agenda, though what I do have is a serious minion gap. How about yourself?

>Every model of solar system formation indicates that Venus formed in >its orbit–so explain how an ET civilization could move a planet across >the light–years.

Key words being "every model" should have given you a freaking clue that we do NOT know all there is to know, but then you keep spouting your intellectual buttology flatulence as though you do, or as though those which your extremely brown nose favors know all there is to know.

>ET may be coming here, but I don't think they can move a planet...
I'll also agree that ETs may have been here and done just about everything you and I can imagine, though I'll not exclude their capability of influencing a given planet and/or that of a spare icy proto–moon into being carefully diverted and/or gently maneuvered along the way for the task of their good intentions of terraforming another world. At least my super–computer that has all of three dyslexic functioning brain cells to work with offers all sorts of viable models that makes it entirely possible for contributions from the Sirius star system to have merged (good or badly) along with our populations of planets, moon and the billions of Kuiper/Oort zone items that have got to be worth something to someone. Thus as for intentionally moving an entire planet isn't exactly all that likely, although influencing it's path as all of holy Oort zone hell breaks lose and the alignment of the major items of gravity gets further involved seems perfectly doable. I'm also not excluding pure happenstance of some holy crapshoot as being a good part of the answer, although why would any ET worth their salt ignore such an interesting opportunity as to share and share alike as long as our two solar systems remained sufficiently near one another?

In spite of an ongoing orchestrated status quo, it seems there's been other life as coexisting upon Venus
