Although the plates are moving slowly, by human standards, there seems a possibility that ocean currents could be changing as a result which in turn would influence weather patterns, not to mention oceanic temperature changes at or near the convergent, divergent and transform plate margins.

I guess to innumerate morons, two continents that are 4,000 miles apart separating by 2cm a year is enough to cause a ocean circulation change in a few years.

But then to the numerically ignorant mind many childish ideas are respectable.

If you flap your arms fast enough you can fly. It's true. Absolutely true...

Are we having another silly Yiddish day?

I agree that a few cm on the move here and there is not the primary cause of GW, although adding to the notion that our 98.5% fluid Earth is affected by our moon is not such a "childish idea".

Speaking of the "numerically ignorant mind"; when did Earth get its last seasonal tilt?

At what given date(s) did our antipode mountains suddenly emerge?
